The first of these is the fact that the human body is not a static entity, but a dynamic one, constantly changing and adapting to its environment. This is evident in the study of human evolution, where the fossil record shows a clear progression from primitive hominids to modern man. The second is the fact that human behavior is not solely determined by biology, but is also shaped by culture and environment. This is evident in the study of human societies, where the same biological traits can be found in different cultural contexts, leading to different behaviors. The third is the fact that human health is not solely determined by genetics, but is also influenced by lifestyle and environment. This is evident in the study of human diseases, where the same genetic predisposition can lead to different health outcomes depending on the environment.
